Title: Storing Secrets in Cloud based Key Management Services

Speaker: Dan O'Boyle, Stack Overflow, Inc.

Talk Description:

Do you encrypt secrets before committing them to a repository? Are API keys and passwords stored in a local library any team member can decrypt? Are you forced to re-encrypt all secrets anytime access has changed?

Stop doing those things!

Cloud Based Key Management Services (Google KMS, Azure Key Vault, Amazon KMS) provide encryption keys as a service. KMS create a centralized access control list. Using a KMS, you can centralize secrets, removing them from local libraries. Key rotation can be automated, often times making a KMS more secure than local key management practices.

About the speaker:

Dan works as an Internal Support Engineer on the IT team at Stack Overflow. He started his career as high school teacher and transitioned into a System Administrator. He enjoys creative collaboration to solve solvable things, and using automation for everything else.

Not going to be in NYC for this. Any chance the slides get uploaded?

Thanks
